Risks with Matted Pets

- A matted coat can cause the skin underneath to be red, irritated, swollen or cracked. This condition will be hidden until the matting is removed.
- A matted coat can conceal the presence of fleas or other pests.
- A matted coat can make it impossible to determine the presence of any moles, scabs, or other conditions on the pet's skin. This makes it more likely that the groomer may accidentally remove, nick, cut open, or damage any hidden preexisting moles, scabs, or other conditions on the skin.
- The grooming process necessary to remove mats may aggravate the pet's skin.
- Matted pets may experience reactions such as hot spots, irritated or sensitive skin, or aural hematomas if mats were located on or around the pet's ears.

Grooming and Matted Pet Release

Many pet parents will choose to shave their pet's coat to help with temperature control, ease of maintenance, or removal of coat in bad condition among many other reasons. While our groomers will use care and caution during this procedure, there are some risks associated with shaving a pet's coat, and recently shaved coats require maintenance to support healthy regrowth.

Risks Associated with Shaving Pets

- The coat may not grow back evenly or may grow in patches.
- The coat could look different in color when it grows back.
- Without the protection of their normal hair coat pattern, pets maybe more susceptible to temperature related health concerns.
- Shaving pets may make them more self-conscious and they may behave differently than normal.
- Shaving the pet may reveal pre-existing skin conditions that were unable to be determined prior to shaving.
- Pets with underlying medical conditions may have a harder time re-growing hair than other pets.

Maintenance of Recently Shaved Pets

- Maintaining the coat as it grows back is very important as the coat now has no weight to shed naturally
- Weekly brushing and regular bathing will help support proper hair re-growth
- Shaved pets should be kept out of the sun as much as possible, but apply sunscreen if exposed to the sun

If mats are found, it is possible that all or part of the coat may not be able to be saved (brushed out) without causing undue discomfort to your pet. For these pets, the matted areas may require shaving. Risks involved with shaving sections of hair due to matting are associated with the same risks and maintenance needs above in addition to the risks of matted hair coats.

Although Best Friends Fur Ever's grooming staff is careful and patient with every dog we have the honor of taking care of, there is a possibility of discomfort or injury during grooming services.
